

Creative Workplaces

Every day, our life is full of challenges. Hitting the traffic, going to work, dealing with customers, colleagues, employees and piles of papers, are some of the expected challenges we face. There are also unexpected ones that we encounter on a daily basis. We need to come up with solutions. A satisfying, nurturing, stimulating, and creative workplace can help individuals take control of not only the expected but also unexpected situations.

Designing a workplace that help individuals feel in charge can reduce job stress, improve work-related skills, increase tolerance, understanding, productivity and enhance decision-making. People feel “locked up” while they are at work. So equipping people with the ability to make more positive use of their work time helps empower the employees as well as businesses.

Today companies are looking to find attractive alternatives to offer their employees such as day care, dry cleaning, game rooms, massage therapy and laundry services to keep them happy. Of course, perks are seductive but creating a work place that caters to the specific and evolving needs of employees and businesses is the most important challenge. Today’s companies and businesses are aware of the need to accommodate and capitalize on the diverse work force.

Finding quality employees is hard, but hiring and most importantly retaining them is the hardest. Deloitte & Touche, a major consulting firm recently surveyed approximately 500 high-technology chief executives. Fifty-five percent said it was important to come up with creative workplace perks to attract the best workers, but most importantly they said the workplace needs to be comfortable.

Work does not have to be a place that we drag in. Work can be the happiest place. By creating welcoming work places, businesses can make work more fulfilling. Individual lives are filled with stress; employees are overwhelmed and hoping to get through the day. By creating a comfortable working environment both businesses and employees can benefit tremendously.
