

The working environment affects performance, productivity, and individual well-being. An enjoyable, positive, and dynamic workplace stimulates growth and productivity. Office jobs can become monotonous, bleak, and unfulfilling. It is the responsibility of employers to give incentives to their workers to come to work. The office needs to be a thriving place to work.

Today businesses are aware of the challenges facing them. They acknowledge that improvements in the workplace are urgently needed because only businesses that best organize and manage their people can succeed in this competitive world. They are paying more attention to health, safety and comfort issues. They also acknowledge that traditional open-plan office layout is not without its problems, and it needs an urgent reform.

The open-plan office introduced by two German management consultants Eberghard and Wolfgang Schnelle in the 1950s was a radical idea. The walls were torn out allowing people to communicate and extend. Ideas traveled across the ocean and came to the United States in the 1960s and open-plan office was an instant success. The traditional office layout based on hierarchy was replaced by an egalitarian approach to work space. The differences mostly derived from function not status. The idea was not isolation but co-existence and collaboration.

The office is a business and a place to socialize. Best ideas are nurtured when there is a constant interaction, and minds are challenged. The office needs to encourage creativity and productivity. A more interactive and open space will lead to a peaceful and collegial work environment. There is a downside to openness as well: the lack of privacy. Open-plan office layout allows conversations to be heard. You can't stop people communicating with you or hearing what you say. Another issue is noise. A quiet atmosphere is needed when you are working on a major project, and sometimes it becomes almost impossible to concentrate.

Today more and more companies are seeking to integrate private and common space. Individuality and diversity are the most important values in today's offices. Following the path of Robert Propst, the man who invented office cubicles 40 years ago, MaispaceMAiSPACE redefines the rules about what the office should and could look like. Propst's invention was revolutionary at the time, and it aimed to increase productivity in the work place. Having productivity and profitability in mind, MaispaceMAiSPACE combines visibility and privacy at your corporate work place in a beautiful and fashionable office furniture system.

Office cubicles have been criticized, mocked, demonized and they inspired a number of comic books. Yet they are still with us and seem like they are not going to disappear in the near future. Last year, office cubicle sales reached $ 4.4 billion, representing 36% of all office-furniture sales. Office cubicles are just right when designed carefully. Office cubicles encourage team spirit yet allow privacy to generate revolutionary ideas.
